

ROLE OF ANACHRONISMS IN SHREK

HARSHVARDHAN V

1. INTRODUCTION

1.1. Definition. An anachronism, as any object or entity that appears temporally out of the context and settings it is placed in. It may be a verbal expression, a technology, a philosophical idea, a musical style, a material, a custom, or anything else closely enough bound to a particular period as to seem odd outside it. The fact that this entity is out of place contributes to its peculiarity.

1.2. Conditions for an anachronism with reference to Movies. Any anachronism has the object and the surroundings that define the period of reference. In the case of a movie, the surroundings of that object constitute the scene or rest of the objects of the movie.

These include

- The props and settings in the movie
- The costumes worn by the characters
- The language and dialects used
- Historical event(s) that is(are) depicted
- The background score

An object that is misplaced in time therefore is one which does not defer to one or more of the other broad entities mentioned above. A common example would be use of idiomatic expressions or words more tuned to the modern era in a movie on the Elizabethan period. The surroundings and scenes in the movie define a reference point or origin to compare the objects in it. In order to define the anachronism, we must first define the period on which we are basing our reference via the scenes and then describe how the object in question is out of place.

2. PARADOX OF ANACHRONISMS IN SHREK

As far as anachronisms go, the Shrek trilogy does occupy a unique place. As part of analysis, particular aspects used will be taken up and supplemented with scene examples to reiterate the point.

Before describing this argument, the following definition must be noted :

Stylistic Anachronism. A setting in which various conflicting anachronisms are thrown into the same scene to create a timeless environment lacking a specific time period.

2.1. The concept of Far, Far Away. The Shrek trilogy plays on the line with which all Fairy Tales begin with “Long Long Ago, in a land Far Far Away”. The Fairy tales being discussed include those by the Brothers Grimm, Hans Christian Anderson and other popular story tellers. The series base the settings and hence the storyline in a place - Far Far Away, in a time - Long Long Ago. Here, it must be noted that logically, since many of the other fairy tales took place in the same period, the characters in those tales are very much likely to be living and participate in the story. The Shrek trilogy cleverly weaves these fairy tales along with the two central characters, Shrek and Fiona to form an entire world. The story of Shrek therefore is based on this “time” that forms the reference frame. Therefore the reference entity is the time mentioned in the fairy tales.

An alternative view is that each object or entity in the scene actually provides the scene with its own time period of reference and a reference for the other objects. But looking at the overall scene, they are actually just thrown in together. Thus they are really anachronisms which are anachronisms of each other with each acting as a reference point for the other. With such a viewpoint, there is nothing that defines the time period of the movie because nothing is dominant.

An important point here is that fairytales in themselves do not have a timeperiod for reference. Thus there is no quantifiable period such as 300 BC. However, because of the style of dressing, the language used and so on it is natural for us to associate fairy tales with a medieval setting. Therefore, any entity such as speaking in modern English or wearing costumes more appropriate today would seem out of place and hence an anachronism. But the alternative approach suggested above would imply that these are not anachronisms at all, since there is no definite time period. These entities are just objects which the viewer would associate with the modern world. There is no reason why they should not exist/have existed during the time of the Shrek story. This peculiar kind of anachronism has been called a “Stylistic Anachronism” and this is the term that will be used to refer to this entity henceforth. The remaining sections will focus on particular entities that could fall under stylistic anachronisms with suitable examples from the movie.

2.2. Music as an Anachronism. The songs used in Shrek follow one common theme. They are all modern songs mainly from the rock genre. They however, do not belong to one particular period or era. The songs themselves are as diverse covering artistes from Smashmouth (“I’m a Believer”, “All Star”) to the Beatles to Bonnie Tyler (“I Need a Hero” as sung by Fairy Godmother). This spread constitutes more than 40 years. The songs are mainly used as an augmentation to the mood created by the scene. However, in most cases they are not put in for dramatic effect. Instead they help to soften the emotions of the scene by way of parody of similar scenes in other movies.

While it could be hypothesised that the songs are anachronisms, they actually conform to the standards set by stylistic anachronisms quite well. A case in point is in Shrek the Third where the King dies and the scene that follows :

The background music is that of Paul McCartney’s Live and Let die (1973). We find the flag being brought down to half-mast as is done at the death of a State-head in today’s world. The scene actually resembles the rainy and foggy jailed scene from Disney’s animated Robin Hood. However, at the funeral, people are seen dressed in medieval costumes, primarily black. The queen then releases a casket into the water with the words Ye Old Foot Locker (a parody of Foot Locker, a sportswear retailer), typical of medieval language. The camera then pans over the characters and ultimately to a far view of the castle which resembles the castle of Gondor, in the Lord of the Rings. So, in the same scene we have a 1970’s pop reference, medieval costumes, a dedication to a modern sportswear store and a parody of another fictional work. None of these dominates over the other. They rather seamlessly merge into one another. And also, since we are dealing with a fairy tale, it is very likely that these are characteristic of the “time” in which this story is based.

Another way in which musical anachronisms are present is in the names of some of the characters in the series such as Sir Justin (Justin Timberlake) and in the main characters singing modern songs such as Puss in Boots singing Livin La Vida Loca (1999).

2.3. Anachronisms with reference to pop culture. The Shrek series is abundant in pop culture references that not only add to the humour but also provide a telling commentary on today’s world. Conventional thinking would encourage that since they refer to pop-culture and the story is placed in an older time frame, they are misplaced in time and hence anachronisms. This argument is fallacious once again in the sense that, the period is not defined.

For the illustration of this point two scenes are brought out, be detailing the events and draw analogies to the pop culture references placed, followed by an analysis.

2.4. Shrek 2 : Storming of Castle By Shrek. This section of the film has one of the largest pop-culture references in the entire series. Shrek has been captured and placed in the dungeon while Princess Fiona and Prince Charming are to attend the Ball. The pre-ball presentation is a parody of the Oscar Ceremony with even an animated Joan Rivers for ME! (a parody E! Entertainment) talking about and commenting on the outfits worn by different “stars” attending the event. The TV presenter is the magic mirror from Snow White. While the watching this on TV, a commercial of Knights (a parody of COPS) is shown. Here, a white bronco (Shrek and Donkey) is being chased by FFAPD (parody of LAPD) whereafter Shrek, Doney and Puss-in-Boots are apprehended by Knights. A knight even finds Cat-nip on Puss (allusion to drugs possession). This is a reference to the OJ Simpson chase scene one of the most popular news items in the last decade. Once caught they are rescued by Pinnocchio, Gingerbread man and others in a scene reminiscent of Mission Impossible. Other pop culture references include The Giant Gingerbread man that storms the castle of Far Far Away (a reference to the "Stay-Puft Marshmallow Man" from Ghost Busters (1984)). He is created in a way that resembles that of Frankenstein. Also, just before he dies, he says to the smaller Gingerbread Man “Be Good”, a reference to E.T., the extraterrestrial. Thus we have a number of movie/television references from the 1980s to the 1990s.

2.5. Shrek 2 : Shrek and Fiona Entering Far Far Away. Shrek and Fiona At the beginning of the journey the path followed by Shrek, Fiona and donkey has mountainous terrain, forests, colourful bridges in a reference to the journey followed by the Fellowship in the Lord of the Rings. As they enter Far Far away, the place is shown to have palm trees in a Florida-esque atmosphere. One can see the sign on the mountain saying Far Far Away, an obvious reference to the Hollywood sign (more than 70 years old). The Fairy Godmother billboard is a parody of the famous Hollywood signs of model, Angelyne (in the 1980s). There are knights which function as traffic police and carriages that act as stretch limos (knights from medieval times and stretch limos being a modern concept). When the group first enters Far Far Away, the camera pans over a distinctive Far Far Away sign at street level (as opposed to the huge one in the hills that resembles the "Hollywood" sign). The street-level sign is a parody of the official "Beverly Hills" sign that welcomes visitors as they enter the city via certain boulevards. In addition, there are some other spoofs of famous signs and stores in the background of Far Far Away, including

- Burger Prince (Burger King)
- Olde Knavery (Old Navy)
- Saxon Fifth Avenue (Saks Fifth Avenue)
- Versarchery (Versace)
- Gap Queen (Gap Kids)
- Farbucks Coffee (Starbucks)
- Tower of London Records (Tower Records).
- Baskin Robinhood (Baskin Robins ice cream)
- Barney's Old York (Barney's New York)

All these stores are anywhere between 30 and 100 years old.

Also, when Shrek and Fiona arrive in Far Far Away, they pass a movie theater playing Lethal Arrow 4 (a parody of Lethal Weapon, 1987).

2.6. Analysis. All the items quote above refer to pop culture and once -famous news items that have occurred or invaded our lives in the last 50 years. Once again, since we are dealing with a fairy-tale where time does not have meaning, it is equally plausible that these items exist(ed) in the world where Shrek lives and hence are not misplaced at all. These would be anachronisms only if Shrek were to inhabit say 15th century England and if it were overwhelmingly hinted by the surroundings in the scene. In addition, once again, not one of the above mentioned points could be said to be the dominant time-defining entity. In essence, they are entities inspired from various times and places in our own history, thrown into the same scene.

Also, there is no justification once again that these events could not have happened in Shrek's history. In fact, it could be that Shrek's life was defined by these events. This is plausible because of the no-time reference fact.

3. COMMENTARY ON MODERN LIFE

3.1. Shrek 3 - School Scene. Some of the anachronisms offer a commentary of the kind of lifestyle adopted by people in modern times. For example, consider the high school scene in Shrek the Third, where he comes to see Arthur, the boy who would eventually become king. If any, these could be considered genuine anachronisms, out of place with the rest of the movie. In this scene, almost every aspect of a typical teenager's life in western countries is shown. This includes school bus-like yellow and black-lined horse carriages, two teenagers jumping out of a van-like carriage apparently having consumed frankincense and Myrrh (allusion to drugs), expressions used by the teenagers ("Totally!"), nerdy kids playing dungeons and dragons (allusion to chess), mascot competitions, slogans such as 'How to Just Say Nay' (allusion to 'How to Say No'), cheerleaders and more. It also deals with the "coming of age story" of Arthur. This particular scene is significant because it could represent the only possible genuine anachronism as an entity that is out of place in time from the rest of the movie. Here the characters speak a different version of English. A counter-argument to this would be that Shrek actually moves out of Far Far Away across shores and it would not be difficult to imagine people speaking a different English.

It is possible that these very same references define the date of the film itself and could be used as a reference for the time period in which it was made or as a “history lesson” of what kinds of thought and headlines dominated our society at the time they were made.

4. CONCLUSION - THE MORAL OF SHREK

Thus we see that the Shrek trilogy though filled with objects that appear to be out of place and hence anachronisms, actually has different objects from different times cast together each defining a time reference for the other but overall providing a timeless scene. That is the essence and the genius of the anachronisms used because they manage to parody modern life, while providing a pseudo-medieval setting that is actually timeless.
